ILLINOIS CONGRESSIONAL PRIMARIES

Tools for enhancing coverage of March 20 election

What are we trying to accomplish?

- For publishers: Provide innovative technology for election coverage
 - The Knight Lab’s charter includes helping local publishers adopt new technologies and spark additional development
 - Our focus is on real-world deployments, with services that publishers will find useful immediately and we can continually develop to improve utility and flexibility
- For consumers: Provide information and insights that add new resources for learning about candidates
 - Knight Foundation mission: Build engaged and informed communities

Why the Congressional primaries?

- The “wave” elections of 2006, 2008 and 2010 make this year’s primary races particularly interesting
- The 10-year redistricting amplified the drama of some races—and increased the need for information
- The meandering shape of districts makes it harder to cover campaign news from throughout the district

Core objectives

- Utilize social media like Twitter and Facebook to offer new perspectives on candidates
- Showcase the potential of databases to enhance coverage in easy-to-understand applications
- Encourage local sites—some of whom are traditional competitors—to utilize links to each others' content for the benefit of their readers?

To meet these objectives, the Lab is monitoring digital media activity associated with the 25 contested races across all 18 Illinois congressional districts

Candidates use social media

- Almost all candidates are now actively managing their social media presence.
 - They're tweeting and posting on Facebook, and cultivating "likes" and "followers"

Just 39 years ago the Supreme Court decided Roe vs. Wade and to trust women to make their own personal medical decisions. But almost every year since that decision, anti-choice advocates have tried to strip away women's rights. Provision by provision these rights have been chipped away at. Enough is enough. We need to keep Roe vs. Wade intact and keep trusting that women can make the right choice for themselves. If elected, I will fight to protect women's rights and not back down.

Online access to contributor data

- Access to data about contributors in federal elections is available online and through APIs
 - Can be explored down to the individual contributor name, address and employer.
- Relatively few local sites show the data online
 - It's not hard to show the raw information, but it's harder to tell a story merely by displaying or mapping the data
- Our approach: use the data to tell a simple narrative of the geographical profile of a candidate's funding
 - How much comes from within Illinois? The DC region?
 - Where is the in-state money coming from?

Our data focuses on geography

Prototype illustrations for discussion purposes only.

Links build stronger local media

- A vibrant local information community will thrive through active and frequent linking among sites of varying sizes, focus and ownership
 - This grows in importance as traditional newsrooms shrink and new entrants create more niche content
 - Resistance to showcasing “competitive” content is fading
- Consumers are less interested in obtaining all information from one particular site—but appreciate curated recommendations and selective aggregation
- Creation of aggregation tools will be an ongoing focus of the Knight Lab
